A diverse ensemble of writers sure to spark an interest you may not know you have.

Jack Robinson

Linda Bergman-Althouse

Nancy Tripp King

Jack Robinson, a historical researcher, authored “Captain Otway Burns and His Ship Snap Dragon.” His historical review of the Swansboro Captain’s adventurous life as a shipbuilder, businessman, state legislator and War of 1812 Privateer is intriguing and awakens the history buff in all of us. A second work entitled “American Bravery” provides official accounts of the War of 1812 Naval battles. Jack has been formally recognized for his untiring dedication to preserving local history. www.jackrobinsonbooks.com

Linda Bergman-Althouse, wildlife rehabilitator and author of the character driven, “Save Them All,” writes about pushing yourself to live strong despite tragic loss and digging deep to face hard choices when values collide. Her novel, inspired by true events, introduces readers to wildlife rehabilitators working twenty-four seven, far behind the scenes, rescuing injured, diseased or orphaned wild animals. A recent review writes “Save Them All is a work of depth, passion, and so much more; drama, mystery, violence, romance and friendship.” www.bergman-althouse.com

Nancy Tripp King, our poet, authored “Tobacco Blossoms and The Pulled-Tight Twine,” a nominee for the Roanoke-Chowan Award For Poetry. A highly popular second poetry collection, “Those Days When Love Doesn’t Work,” was selected and published as part of Main Street Rag’s Editor’s Select Poetry Series. Her most recent writing credits include Evansville Review, Concho River Review, Pembroke, Asheville Poetry Review, Iris, and a Pushcart Award nomination from Coal City Review. Nancy resides in Jacksonville with her husband, two cats who were once strays but who now think they own the place and an old dog they inherited several years ago.
